Airplane Amenity Bags You'll Want to Keep Long After Your Flight

Gone are the days when airline amenity kits were dreadful polyester pouches filled with packets of toothpaste and greasy moisturizer. Today, airlines are constantly one-upping each other to offer the most glam goodie bags. And you don't have to be sitting in first class to score one either. These new business class amenity containers are unique, beautiful, and worth toting around even after you used up all the amenities.

Qantas

Feel free to use up all of Qantas's selection of Malin+Goetz skincare products, but hang on to the Jack and Kate Spade bags. They're a perfect size for storing your travel docs and mobile accessories.

► Turkish

Turkish Airlines is no stranger to name-dropping (ever seen their commercials?), and for its sleek business-class amenities bag, the world's fastest-growing airline turned to Porsche. The new hard-shell case is the first time Porsche Designs allowed its brand to be used for an in-flight amenity kit, and contains the Italian skincare brand Acca Kappa's "Green Mandarin" line.

► United

Starting this month, United is handing out collectible tins containing Philisophy skincare products in its BusinessFirst class on international flights. Each of the eight designs features one of the airline's main hub. Go ahead—collect them like baseball cards. They'll be available until March or until they run out.

► Cathay Pacific

Launched last fall, Cathay Pacific's business class kits feature neutral Australian Jurlique products inside pouches designed by agnès b. The disposable toothbrush and shoehorn, by the way, are made mainly from biodegradable cornstarch and cellulose.

► Finnair

Sometimes less is more. Finnair's kit may look like a lunch bag, but the ultra-environmentally-conscious kit is intentionally minimalist, and in order to minimize waste, passengers can handpick Finnish natural cosmetics in green tea or birch scent from flight attendants. You won't be toting this bag around, but at least you'll know it's made with recycled ingredients and will be recycled again.
